

Abstract

The period from 1948 to 1955 was crucial for West Germany's attempts to regain her sovereignty and to achieve her integration into the West. During that time the three zones placed under the Supreme Authority of the Western Allies gradually progressed to becoming a (quasi) sovereign state and a full member of NATO.

Wilhelm Grewe, a German professor of international law, was one of those who at a very early stage pleaded for a Statute of Occupation (in 1948, he published Ein Besatzungsstatut für Deutschland) in order to create a legal framework for the relations between the Allies and Germany.

In 1951 Konrad Adenauer appointed him Head of delegation for the negotiation of the General Treaty on Germany ("Deutschlandvertrag"). With his legal expertise and his political pragmatism Wilhelm Grewe tried to fulfill the Chancellor's objectives. The negotiations focused on German sovereignty, supreme authority, the reserved rights of the Allies and a security guarantee for the Federal Republic. This treaty, which was coupled with the EDC, was signed in May 1952.

The ratification of both treaties gave rise to stormy debates in the "Bundestag", concentrating especially on the questions of German reunification and rearmament. Grewe was then entrusted with the legal defence of the treaties vis-à-vis Parliament and the Constitutional Court.

He was again called to play an important role when the General Treaty had to be renegotiated after the EDC had failed. In May 1955 a revised "Deutschlandvertrag" entered into force, the Statute of Occupation was abolished and the Federal Republic of Germany became a member of NATO and of the WEU.

Key words:

Konrad Adenauer – Germany 1948-55 – political counsellor – reserved rights of the Allies – integration into the West – Federal Republic of Germany – German sovereignty – Statute of Occupation – General Treaty 1952 – Paris Treaties 1954 – Wilhelm Grewe

